

Informant vs Inmate: The Covert War against the Black Vote!

Snippet:

There is a forceable demonstration to dismantle any infrastructure a candidate has in place or will put in place to expand the candidacy that favors him positively and out existing operations at risk. We are talking about "systems," a consortium of businesses within the business of politics, and all the fringes in jeopardy if seats cannot be retained. The longer an incumbent has served, the more likely there is so much to lose. Now, we are not naive in thinking the next person would not rebuild the same type of base and reinstate questionable activities, but sometimes what constituents get is the lesser of the evil when moral compasses are not aligned to do the right thing and uphold the law.

INTRODUCTION

Despite the economic and cultural war against your family, and community by those to whom you pledge allegiance, there has never been a more critical period than now to prepare yourself with information and do things differently. What has been the norm has left too many encased into a cycle of going “nowhere” fast.

Here’s a glimpse of the murky dichotomy that many blacks haven’t fully embraced as a real operation against their well-being, but its inner workings have diminished and even eliminated substantial progress for decades on large scales.

Many persuasions ask, “Why do blacks predominately vote for Black Democratic candidates? I mean, we understand historically the need for the United States to open its political corridors for inclusion, but not principally because a person is of a particular race.” Their assessment is duly noted.

Just look at the flop before us that President Biden forced Blacks to accept... There is “NO” representation of black people. VP Kamala Harris has zero commitment to the Black community so, are we to settle for this attractive Caribbean Southeast Asian as the sum blacks fought decades to see? Though Joe thinks we should toss her our support, I think not.

Informant vs Inmate: The Covert War against the Black Vote!

She, along with other Democrats, like Barack Obama had no problems in telling the world, “I don't represent black people only”. Although, this is correct, could we at least get some representation for something that benefits blacks and does not equate to a water-down handout? Can we for once get some real business on the table i.e., procurement contracts? Where the real business that Whites have benefited from since its inception be allotted to us to compete. Trust me, we have qualified people; they just need an open door that the system has maintained to keep closed with a tight grip and is extremely selective about who enters this world.

It must be said, Black Americans should get comfortable being uncomfortable in addressing the age-old question; do we need a political Savior? The little secret that affects Blacks on colossal scales is not understanding who is representing us: Informants or Inmates.

It is very late in the political game; laws are still passing in many states to block Black ascension, but Black people must pull up, and take responsibility and ownership of their future. As a “People”, we can no longer be okay with chintzy campaign promises that end up as fragmented programs with limited dished-out dollars to create the appearance of caring about you and respect for your vote.

At some point we have to be honest, the measurements are always short-term. What gives? Who is really fighting for us? The CBC? I think not. The Congressional Black Caucus has stepped up more for illegals or if you want to play nice, “undocumented” people than they have collectively fought for anything that benefits the people who elected them.

How long will we settle for crumbs from the table when the spread is before us?

Only we can change the scorecard.
