

For centuries, Black people have been the living embodiment of resilience—the spirit of survival made flesh. Through enslavement, systemic oppression, economic sabotage, cultural erasure, and the exploitation of their artistry, Black people have continually defied the odds stacked against them.

We really believe as a race God will vindicate us - even from our own.

This defiance has not been passive but rather an active, creative, and enduring struggle that has birthed brilliance. Yet, in this struggle, one cannot help but ask: What is it about Black genius that provokes such visceral reactions from others, particularly white and Jewish communities, who have historically positioned themselves as both benefactors and adversaries in this complex saga?

Why the fuss when the man behind the flag says, No MORE!
